

The Struggle Continues

In the 1950s and 1960s, our parents and grandparents fought the scourge of segregation—and they won. But in 2012, millions of poor children are now trapped in chronically failing K-12 schools. Every 26 seconds, another child drops out of a public school. And so today, we must fight groups that are spending hundreds of millions of dollars to prevent our children from accessing better schools.

By opposing school choice programs that help all children, unions, some politicians, and even some civil rights groups are making it harder for poor children of all races to get a quality education. As we celebrate Black History Month, we have a moral obligation to make our future brighter than the darkest days of our past.

Become a foot soldier in the battle for the future of all of America's children—the fight for school choice.
